The drill buzzes and hums and trying to turn the chuck it would appear that it is providing holding torque on the rotor when the power is on. I have tried alsorts including changing polarity of field coils with respect to rotor and putting power direct onto the motor instead of via the vari speed trigger but still no go.

Solution with AC Circuit Analysis. That is to say that we need to determine contribution of each source on $i_x(t)$. Then, the final answer is to obtained by adding the individual responses in the time domain. Please note that, since the impedances depend on frequency, we need to have a different frequency-domain circuit for each frequency.
